Problem

The most interesting and informative stories regarding news events are not being told.

Traditional news reporting is too formal focusing on facts rather than experiences Immediacy, emotion and real-life experience are becoming as important an element of news to us as facts and analysis.

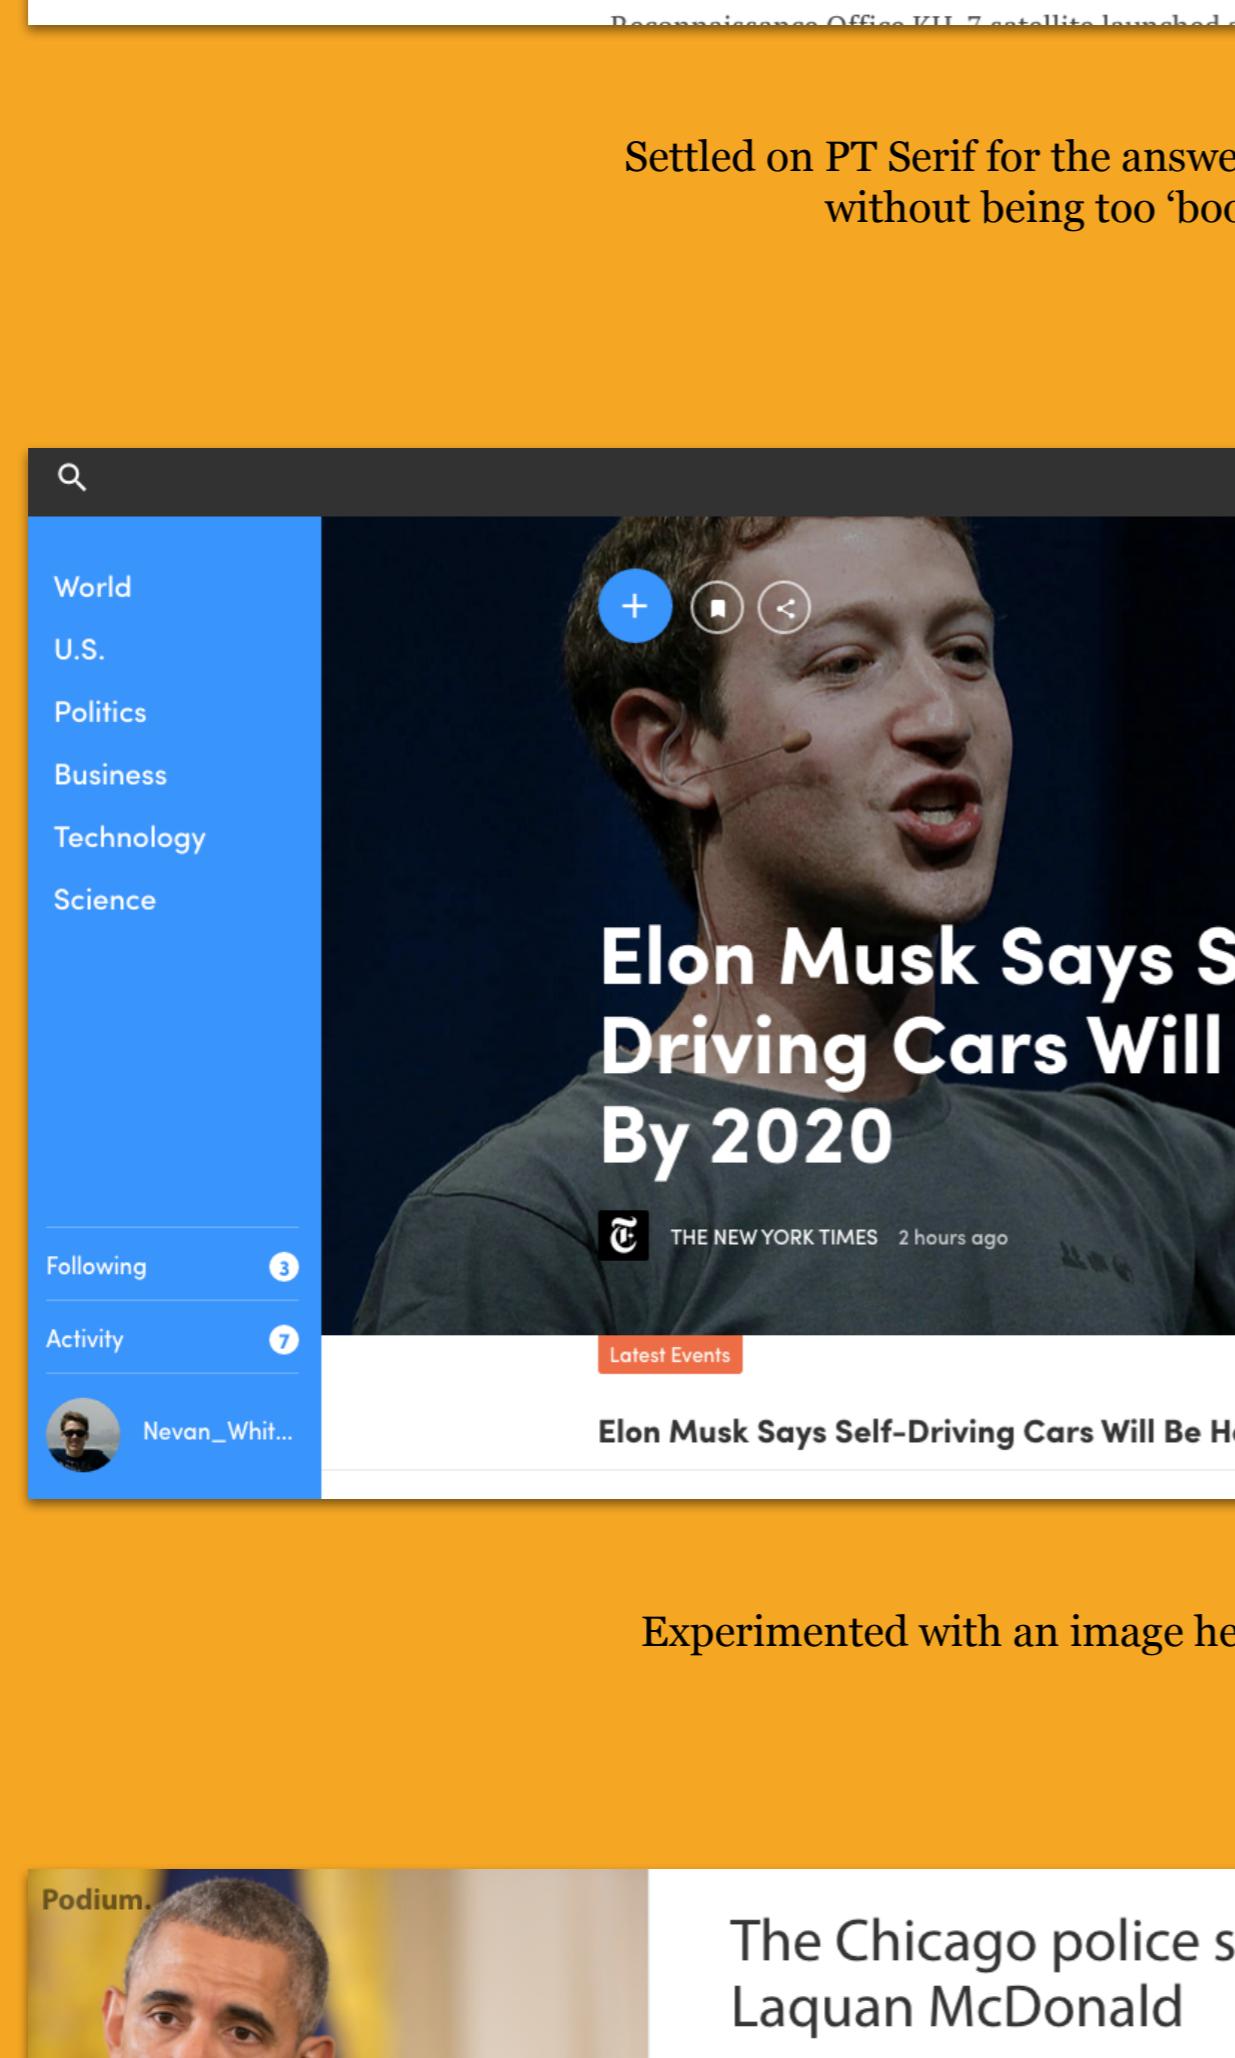

Solution

A website where anyone can ask and answer questions about specific news events. Answers can be upvoted, commented.

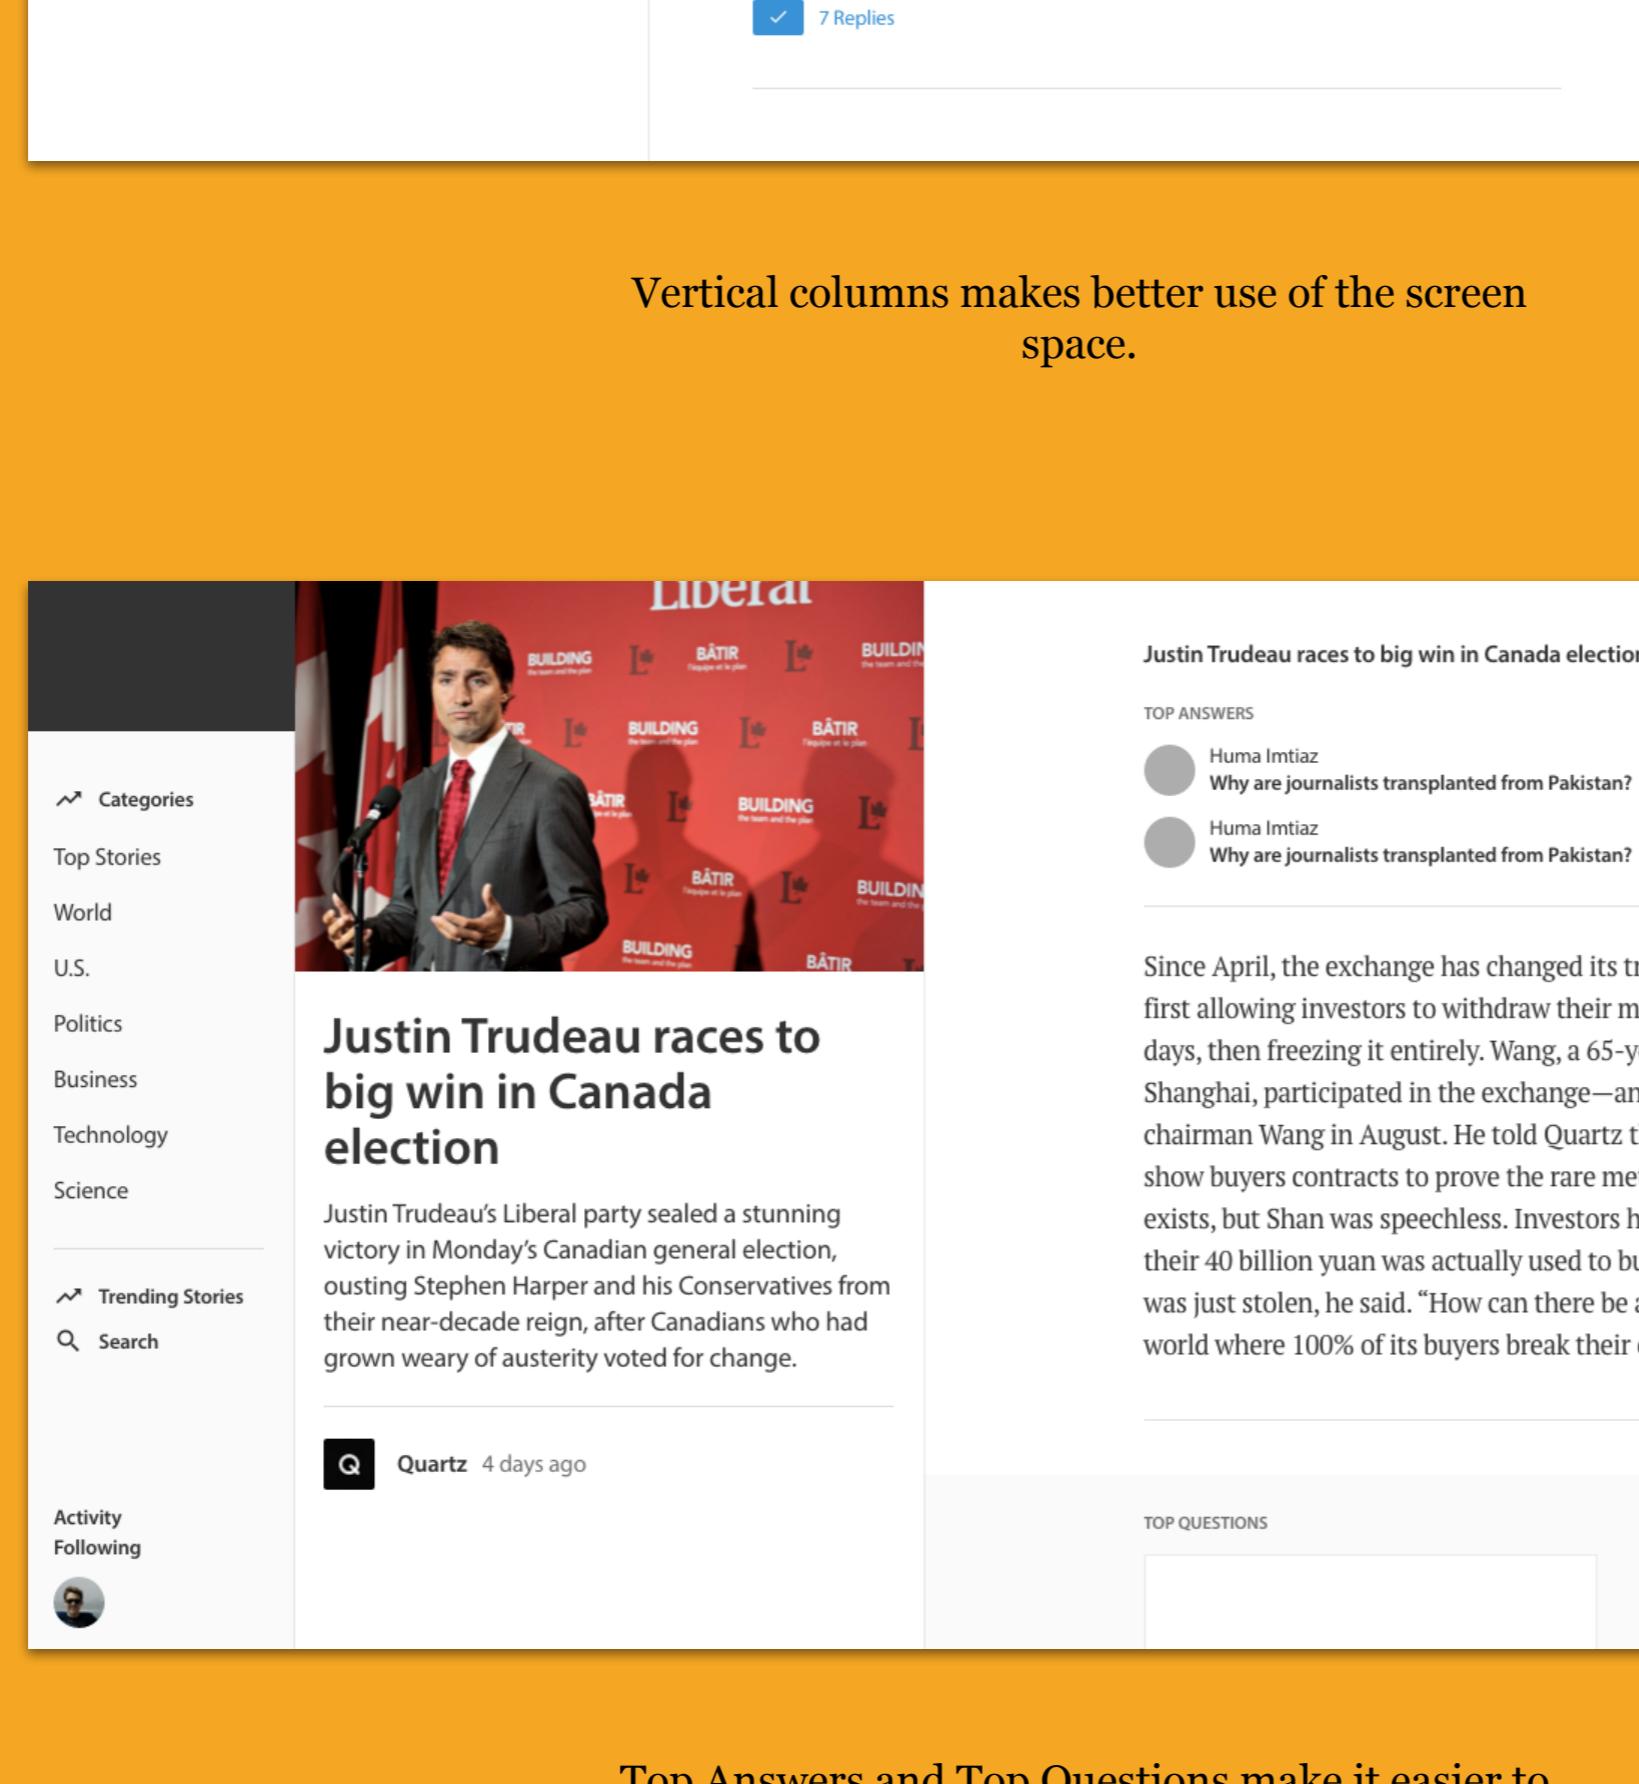

Answers from witnesses or experts in their field

I went through multiple iterations playing around with colour schemes, typography, column layout.

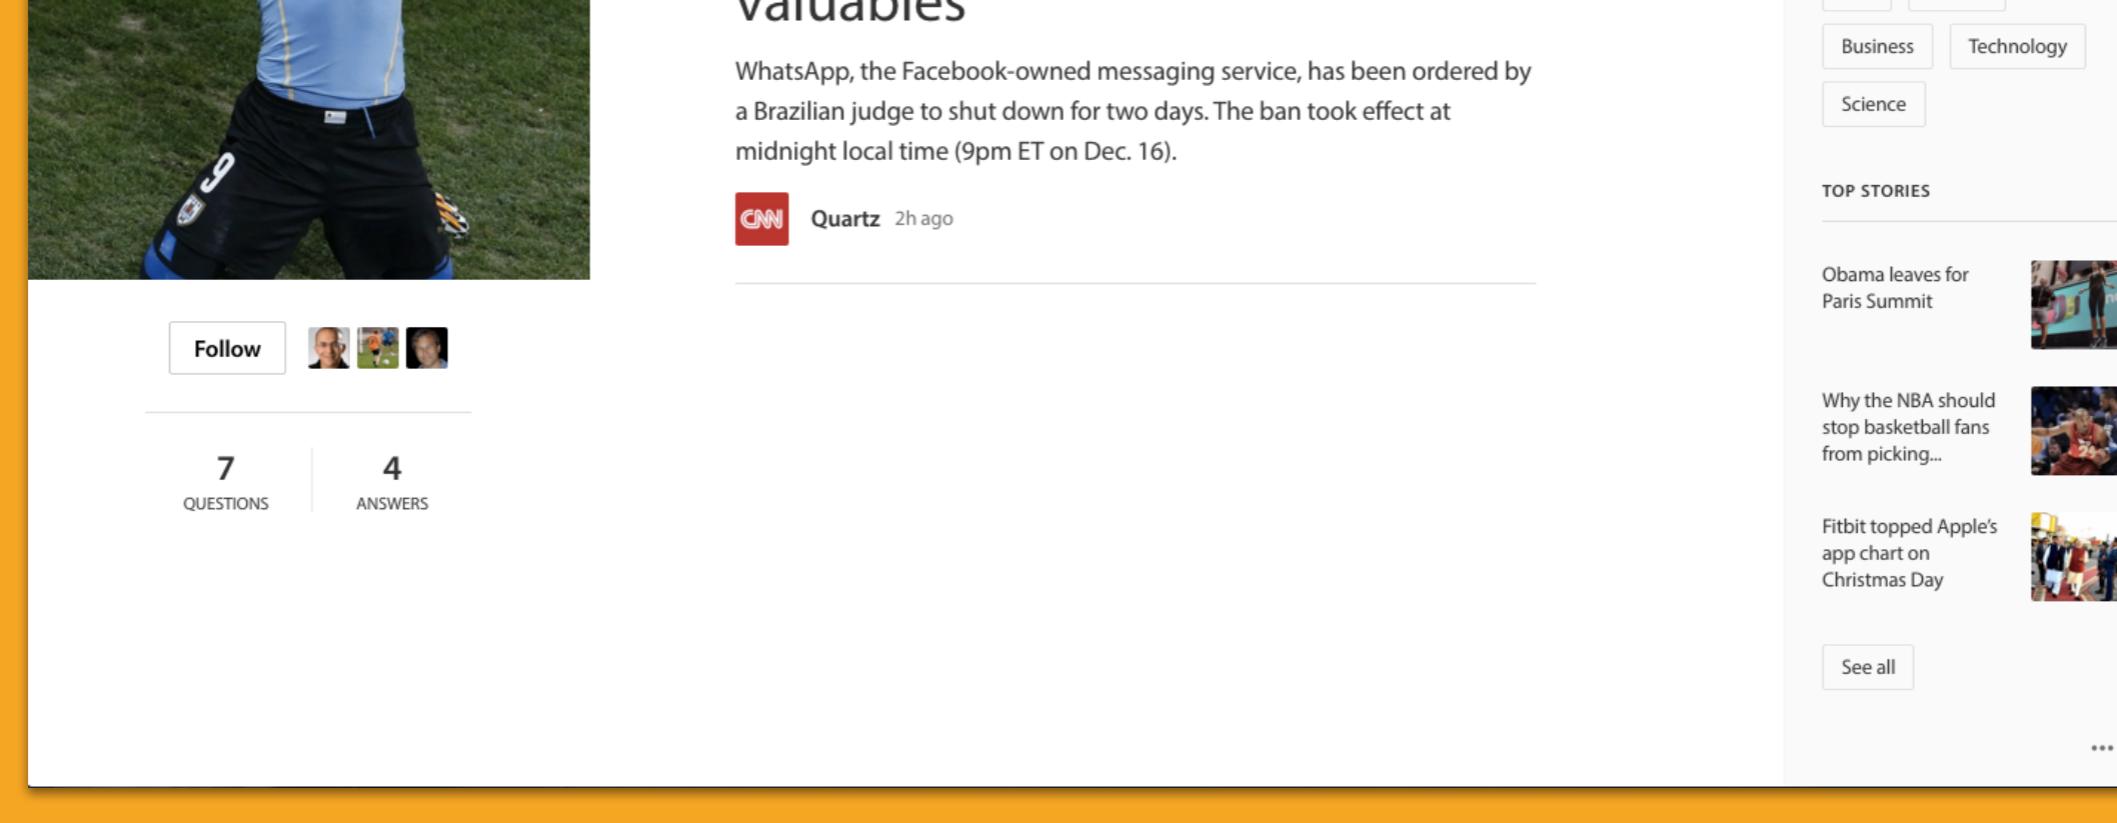

(All screenshots are fully coded with a Ruby on Rails backend)

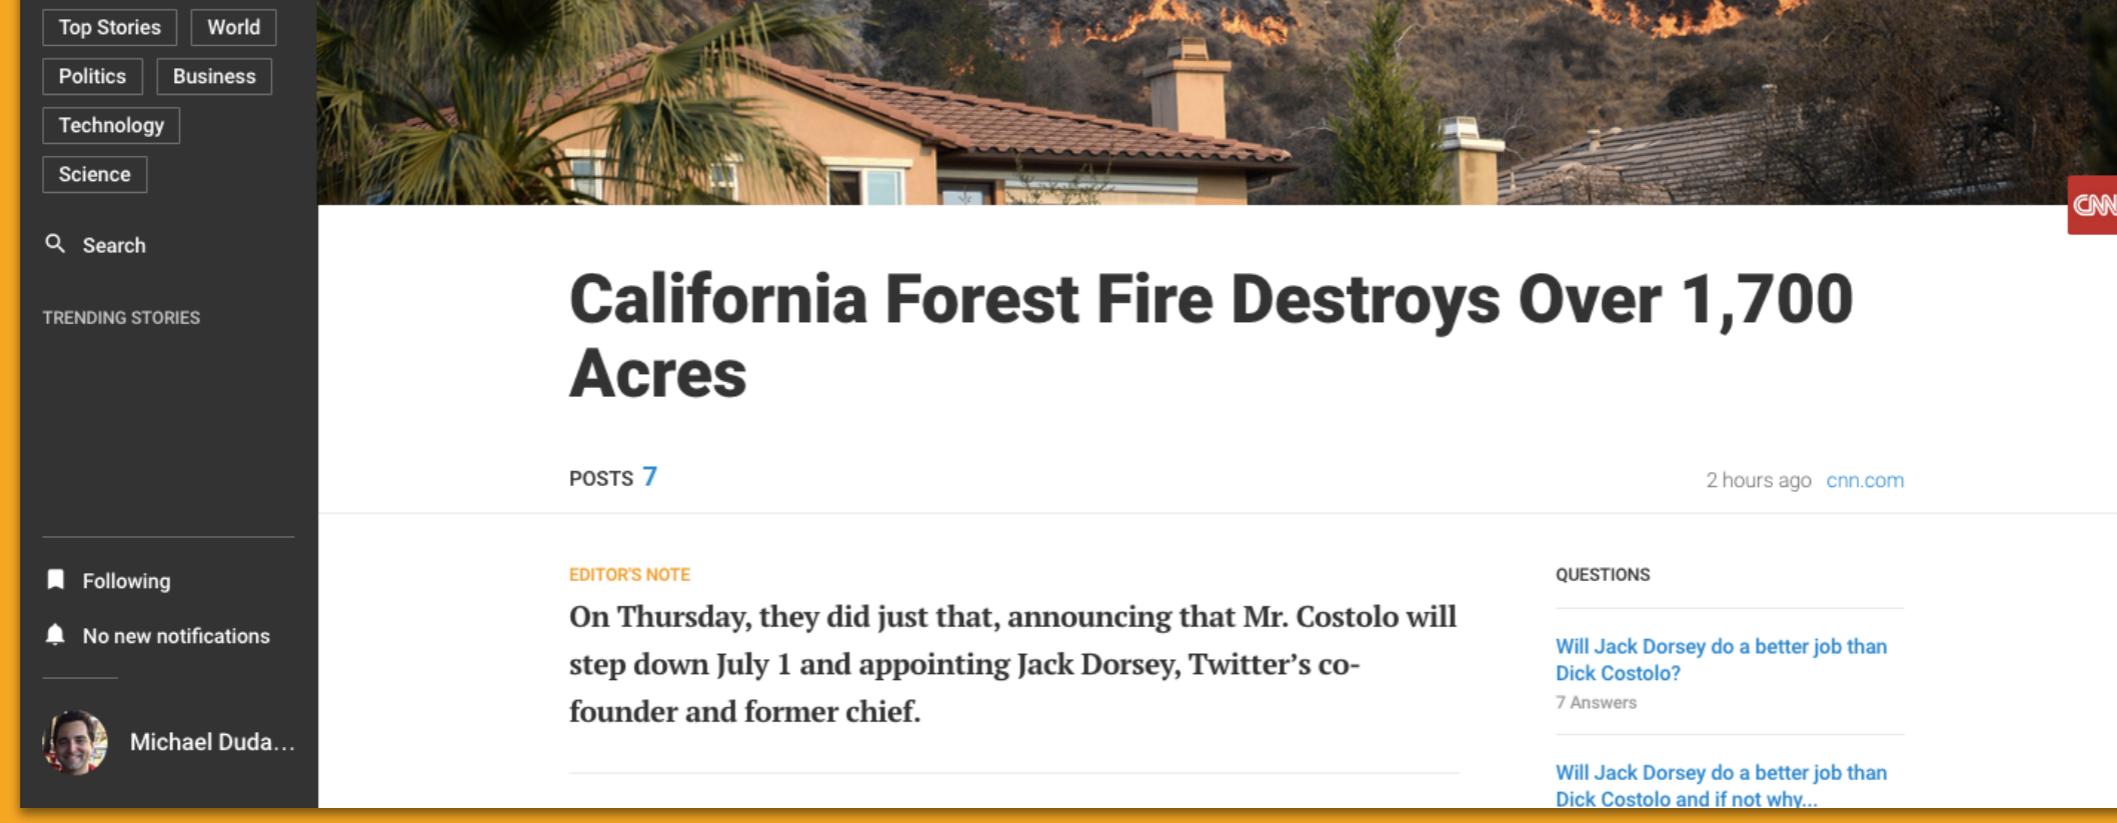

Some early explorations of the story page

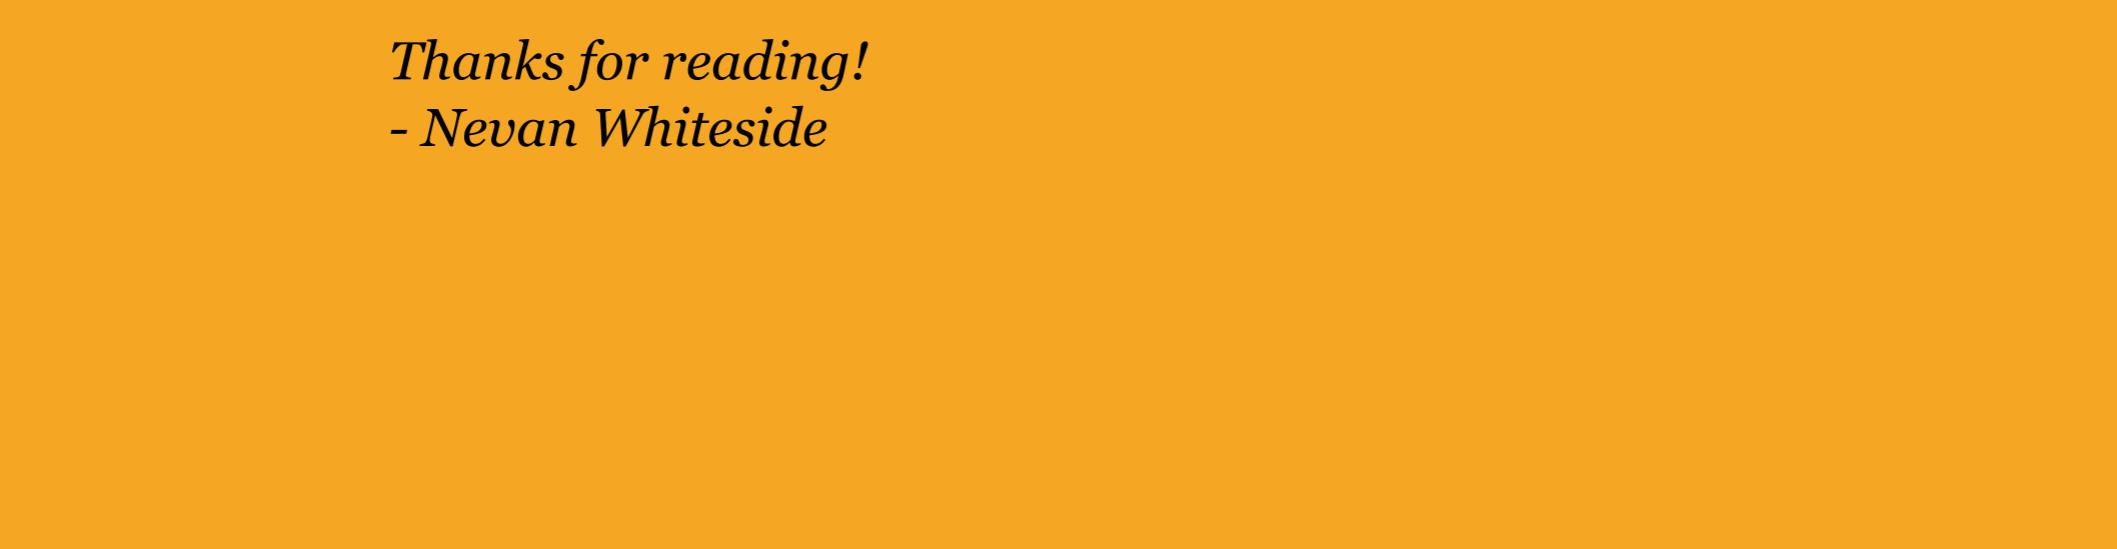

Settled on PT Serif for the answer text. Readable without being too 'bookish'

Experimented with an image heavy story page.

Vertical columns makes better use of the screen space.

Top Answers and Top Questions make it easier to quickly scan a story.

Moving the story summary to the center column means less horizontal eye scrolling.

Lessons Learned

Be sure of a font before purchasing it!

Writing html and css will always be slower than making mockups in Sketch.
